The Realist

4 Russian Roulette by Dimitri K. Simes

The current conversations of the American political class are frighteningly similar to past black-and-white misinterpretations of fundamental foreign-policy decisions. The reaction to the Russia-Georgia crisis is just the most recent example of the lack of rational foreign-policy discussion.

Articles

8 Oil Dependence As Virtue by Daniel W. Drezner

Imagine a world free of oil—one with diversified Arab economies divorced from the dollar, African nations devoid of the resource curse, and China and India ascendant. As it turns out, a world without oil dependence is world that doesn't need an American superpower.

17 Afghan Awakening by Bing West

Can Kabul be saved? More troops are on the way, but a one-size-fits-all surge is not enough. We also need to change our tactics. If Washington wants to prevail in Afghanistan, we need to learn from successes in Iraq, and focus on fighting a war—not building a nation.

25 Standoff at the 38th Parallel John Bolton vs. James A. Kelly

A nuclear North Korea is more than a foreign-policy irritant. Sharing radioactive knowledge with other malcontents would be a disaster. With current negotiations facing hard times, two former statesmen go head-to-head on how to handle the DPRK. John Bolton argues it is time for a harsh crackdown on a misbehaving North, while James Kelly thinks we need to give talks a chance.

36 Iranian Resurrection by Robert Baer

Iran is becoming a superpower. Funding proxy armies, controlling vital energy hubs and winning the heart of the Arab street, Tehran has created a sphere of influence on an imperial scale. If we don't do something—and soon—Iran, not China or Russia, will be the West's global nemesis.

46 Xenophobia on the Continent by Andrew Kohut & Richard Wike

Anti-Semitism is on the march in Europe. But the Europeans' new turn toward isolationism goes even further than that. With negative views of Jews rooted in a rising tide of xenophobia based on a growing dislike for globalization, immigration and Muslims, this is a problem not to be ignored.

53 The Art of Petraeus by T. X. Hammes

There is no doubt that General Petraeus's strategies salvaged Iraq. His successes, however, mask a vital policy debate about the future of our armed services. American leaders must ignore the false choice between forces prepared for counterinsurgency or those trained for conventional warfare. Can we create a military ready for all types of future wars?

60 Pakistan Postscript by Daniel Markey

A post-Musharraf Pakistan faces a future that could include military coups, growing extremism, a potential collapse of the state or a move toward rogue-nation status. There is no easy fix for Islamabad, but Washington must work with allies in Pakistan to avoid a potential catastrophe.

68 Israel's Fight-or-Flight Response by John Mueller & Ian S. Lustick

A nuclear Iran may not be the biggest threat to Israel. Fear is a danger in and of itself. Until now, Israel has triumphed in the Middle East against overwhelming odds because of a clever, rational defense policy that used force as a last resort. If it adopts this attitude again, it can certainly withstand an atomically armed Tehran.

The nuclear apocalypse is everyone's worst nightmare. A suitcase laden with nuclear material. A dirty bomb in a major city. How real is the nuclear terrorism threat?

79 The Tao of the Arab Center by Paul R. Pillar

The Bush administration may have gotten a lot wrong, but there is still hope for America's policy in the Middle East. Three books shed some light on how the United States can get over Iraq, focus on the Arab center and bring a revitalized strategy of reform to a beleaguered region.

89 Reflections from the Right by Jacob Heilbrunn

The conservative movement is cracking up—just look at three memoirs of former administration officials.

These new books may engage in justification and self-aggrandizement, but they do prescribe salves for fixing the

The Guns of August

A War with No Winners Oksana Antonenko
It is hard to understand what prompted Saakashvili to turn the Russian–Georgian cold war hot. In this test of wills, none of the parties has emerged a winner.

American Politics, World Consequences

- 37 Iraq and the Next American President *Toby Dodge*The hazard for the next president is that his policy will owe more to bitter and ideologically driven arguments in Washington than to the situation in Baghdad.
- The Tyranny of False Vision: America's Unipolar Fantasy David P. Calleo
 The American political imagination is possessed by a hazardous geopolitical vision. Americans have trouble realising how revolutionary and threatening their unipolar vision can appear to others.
- 79 America after the Elections: A Strategy of Conservation Sarah Sewall

 The overarching strategic challenge facing the United States is to revitalise the international system so that the nation can conserve its strength and power even as the global environment shifts.
- Restoring America's Image: What the Next President Can Do Mitchell B. Reiss Both candidates recognise that the world's image of America today is at odds with how the American people perceive themselves and could have serious implications for America's foreign policies.
- 115 Washington's Apparent Readiness to Start Nuclear War Andy Butfoy
 The next administration will continue to face the sort of strategic challenges that have held the United States back from ruling out nuclear first-use options.
