There are abundant reports in the current issue covering the controversial Diamer Bhasha Dam in PoK. The construction work on the dam project was reportedly started in October and Pakistani Prime Minister Yusuf Raza Gilani paid a visit to PoK for the ceremony. Going by the reports in Pakistan, there is mixed response to the Diamer Bhasha project. Some see it as a panacea to the severe energy crisis prevailing in Pakistan, as once completed this project is slated to produce 4500 MW of electricity. The failure of the Kalabagh Dam project to finally take off due to political tussle at the domestic level has left Pakistan with no option but to pin its hope on the Diamer Bhasha Project. As a result, Pakistan has completely overlooked the controversies surrounding this ambitious project. The Diamer Bhasha dam is located in a site which legally belongs to India. Not only this, there are ecological implications involving the project which threaten the region with a huge calamity in future owing to its location in an extremely sensitive seismic zone. Notably, a massive earthquake hit the so called AJK in PoK in October 2005 and the region is yet to recover from the colossal losses incurred therein.

In a significant development, Indian Chief of the Army, General VK Singh referred to the presence of at least 3000-4000 Chinese troops in PoK. Reports about Chinese forays in PoK have been doing the rounds for a long time and its due accreditation by the Indian Army Chief has given credence to such reports. At the same time, it also emphasizes the need for India to strongly protest against the Chinese role in PoK.

There is unrest in PoK following arrests of certain leaders by the Pakistani authorities. Locals from PoK staged protests in Karachi demanding the release of a popular activist Baba Jan belonging to Gilgit Baltistan I.

Chinese Troops in Pakistan-occupied-Kashmir: Gen VK Singh

The Economic Times, October 6, 2011

NEW DELHI: In what should send alarm bells ringing in the Indian security establishment, Army Chief Gen VK Singh on October 5 confirmed the presence of some 4,000 Chinese, including troops belonging to the People's Liberation Army of China in Pakistan-occupied-Kashmir (PoK). The presence of the Chinese, including members of their defence forces, has been a matter of intense speculation here in India. But it's the first time an Army Chief has gone public with India's assessment about the kind of Chinese presence in PoK.

M.I. Mazhar, PPP cradles Yaqoob dynasty in Azad Kashmir

October 28, 2011

By officially supporting sitting president's daughter in AJK bye-election, Pakistan Peoples Party has cradled another political dynasty in Azad Kashmir. Farzana Yaqoob Khan, a candidate of ruling Peoples Party and daughter of President Sardar Yaqoob Khan, won bye-election of Azad Kashmir Legislative Assembly in Rawalakot. The seat of LA-19, Poonch-3 constituency was vacated by Sardar Yaqoob Khan after his election as President of the State. Earlier, Sardar Yaqoob had won the elections from this constituency by a massive margin. He had secured 27,655 votes in the general elections, defeating Sardar Khalid Ibrahim of JKPP who got 17,354. Consensus reached on dam royalty

Dawn, October 30, 2011

MANSEHRA: The Water and Power Development

Authority and elders of Kohistan on October 29 reached an agreement on payment of the Diamer-Bhasha dam's five per cent royalty to the district and immediate release of money to the owners of the land acquired for the project.

The agreement was signed by Chairman Wapda Shakeel Ahmad Durrani and 13-member Harban Diamer committee of Kohistan in Abbottabad. On the call of Harban Diamer committee, locals blocked Karakoram Highway from October 15 to October 17 for payment of royalty and money of the land acquired for the dam. They cleared the road to the traffic only after the government agreed to accept their demands. Local MPA Abdul Sattar Khan told reporters on the occasion that it was a great achievement of the people of Kohistan that the government had accepted their right of dam royalty and agreed to pay them their land's cost.

Resettlement and royalties

Dawn, October 29, 2011

In Pakistan where water and other energy resources are becoming increasingly scarce, the creation of large-capacity dams appears a sensible idea. However, the creation of such reservoirs has been a contentious issue as in the case of the Kalabagh dam project which had to be shelved. The most recent project to be put on course after three decades was the Diamer-Bhasha dam. Meanwhile, the upgrading of Mangla Dam has failed to live up to expectations, even though the main project of raising the dam's height was completed in 2008. The sticking points tend to be squabbling among the provinces over projected revenues and the resettlement and compensation for those displaced. Both Gilgit-Baltistan and Khyber Pakhtunkhwa have laid territorial claims to the Diamer-Bhasha dam, for example, while raising the height of Mangla Dam has affected 50,000 people. The issue of resettlement and compensation has not yet been addressed, leading to resistance by the affected communities against the filling of the reservoir.

Alya Alvi, Bhasha dam and foreign powers

Dawn, October 28, 2011

The World Bank has come under severe criticism from international development lenders for not funding the $12 billion Diamer-Bhasha dam, the 'highest priority project'. According to reports, the forthcoming strategic dialogue between the US and Pakistan ahead of a fresh round of discussions by the Water Sector Task Force of the Friends of Democratic Pakistan would focus on Islamabad's precise plans for water sector reforms and the World Bank's lack of interest in the Diamer-Bhasha dam project. The two events are expected early next month. No mega development-related project has so far been funded by US, except for some conditional donations.

Tahir Niaz, Good on paper, poor on ground

Pakistan Today, October 27, 2011

ISLAMABAD: It goes without saying that the Pakistan People's Party (PPP)-led government did wonders at the political front during its around four-year tenure when it comes to legal and constitutional achievements, but at the same time it is justifiable to say that it has miserably failed in providing relief to the masses. It would be dishonesty if the government is not credited for its policy of reconciliation which remained the epicentre of its politics since it took over and no doubt it paid back to the government.

Let it be the 7th National Finance Commission (NFC) Award, 18th and 19th constitutional amendments, internal autonomy to Gilgit-Baltistan or the Aghaz-e-Haqooq-e-Balochistan Package, the PPP-led government deserves credit at least for the initiatives it took, though support of the other political parties was also vital in this regard.

Diamer-Bhasha dam: a perspective

Dawn, October 27, 2011

The project is being touted as a multi-faceted saviour for Pakistan's development, but in fact its construction will be one of the most disastrous investments for the entire nation with far-reaching impacts, especially in the scenario of climate change. The dam structure is not capable of controlling large floods, and it will be devastating also when an earthquake rocks it in this most risky zone, and might forever damage the Indus River bed at this precious location. When such an incident will occur, we will not be able to count in dollars the losses incurred by the devastation to this lifeline of the entire nation. In its regular operation, the overall volume of water in the Indus which will be able to reach downstream is one of the most important issues which is being disregarded, even though we have alarmingly witnessed the desertification of large tracts in Sindh.

Awareness about this issue needs to reach Pakistanis in other regions immediately. We should talk about the impacts on the soil, water, habitats and livelihoods of people in lower riverine areas if we are to speak of a mega project as beneficial. As climate change will now regularly rock us between droughts and flooding, we are talking about a life and death situation and millions of Pakistani citizens. Each of the benefits of a dam power-generation, water storage and irrigation can be achieved through many other means which we are already capable of practising. What solutions were good 60 years ago are no longer viable, and it is time not to forcefully dominate nature, but to work with it through smaller-scale interventions which are sustainable and which empower local communities. There is now only one way towards development let us religiously save our precious environmental resources, and fashion our projects accordingly. Save Pakistan now.

Diامر-Bhasha boundary dispute: Gilgit rejects K-P's claim to part of dam

The Express Tribune, October 26, 2011

GILGIT: Existing tensions between Gilgit-Baltistan (G-B) and Khyber-Pakhtunkhwa (K-P) have increased over the controversy of the Diامر-Bhasha dam, with both sides claiming rights to the dam. G-B legislative assembly members rejected K-P's claim over part of the structure on October 25 and decided to inform the federal government about "encroachment" through "proper channels". "K-P's claim over some eight kilometres of land in Diامر is baseless and so, is rejected," the lawmakers decided in an informal meeting chaired by the G-B legislative assembly speaker. Members of the G-B assembly stated that the K-P assembly had recently passed a resolution claiming land in Diامر. According to members, the K-P assembly also demanded equal compensation for the people of Kohistan likely to be affected by the construction of the proposed dam.

Moving in the right direction

Daily Times, October 21, 2011

The government has finally started building the $ 12 billion Diامر-Bhasha Dam, 30 years after completion of its first feasibility report, a long time indeed. If the decision had been taken well in time, the country's state would have been far different from what it is now. The world's highest concrete dam with a height of 272 metres is being built on the Indus River about 300 kilometres upstream of Tarbela Dam. It would generate 4,500 MW electricity and store 8.1 million acre feet of water. The dam will take over 12 years to complete and then start benefiting the energy-starved and water-short country.

Some would say that there are other projects, even faster ones, which would compensate for the water and electricity shortfall quicker than the Diamer-Bhasha dam, such as the Kalabagh Dam (KBD). The KBD if begun in the middle of Musharraf's tenure would have partially bridged our current shortfall of five to six thousand megawatts of electricity by adding 3,600 MW to the system. But even that would have been a high price for less load shedding given that Sindh would arguably have been lost to the country as the province, being the lower riparian, has been the strongest opponent of KBD on a number of accounts. Rejected by the assemblies of three smaller provinces, this proposed dam has become too politicised over the decades. Stress on building this dam, a hotbed of conflicts, can easily cause fissures harming the unity of the country. The issue of water distribution among the provinces already keeps them at loggerheads even in the presence of the Indus River System Authority (IRSA), set up in 1992 to ensure equitable distribution of water among the provinces.

Pakistan is the only country through which the Central Asian states could do business with the world either through Gwadar port in Balochistan province or the proposed Gilgit-Tajikistan road. Diamer-Bhasha dam

Dawn, October 20, 2011

The Diamer-Bhasha dam with a projected capacity of producing 4,500MW of electricity is formally on course some three decades after the first feasibility report on the project was concluded during Gen Zia's rule. It has been a long journey signifying loss of precious time as well as the extreme difficulties such projects have to deal with. Experts will once again point out the shortcomings of the project, and inevitably, Kalabagh will crop up. Then there will be discussions of some practical problems Diamer-Bhasha itself is faced with. Almost 100km of the Karakoram Highway will have to be rebuilt to accommodate the dam; there will be loss of a stretch of agricultural land; and nearly 3,000 people will be displaced not to speak of the danger to the petroglyphs in the area that connect us with the Silk Route of an age gone by.

Gurmeet Kanwal, Continuing turmoil in Gilgit-Baltistan

Deccan Herald, October 19, 2011

The people are demanding genuine democratic rule and the right to govern themselves. Reports of a major Chinese presence in the Gilgit-Baltistan area have been pouring in. While Selig Harrison of the New York Times put the figure at 11,000, the Indian Army chief stated recently that about 4,000 Chinese workers, many of them PLA soldiers, are engaged in construction and mining activities in the Northern Areas. This unprecedented Chinese presence is being deeply resented by the local people.

The Gilgit Agency and Baltistan in Pakistan Occupied Kashmir (POK), that now comprise the Northern Areas, were part of Jammu and Kashmir (J&K) at the time of partition. The woes of the people of the Northern Areas began on November 4, 1947, soon after J&K acceded to India in terms of the Independence of India Act. A young British major who was commanding the Gilgit Scouts overstepped his authority and illegally declared the accession of the Northern Areas to Pakistan. It shall remain one of the quirks of history that a Major of the British Raj could violate good order and military discipline and seal the fate of the people of an area almost as large as England.

World Bank accused of dithering over Bhasha dam

October 25, 2011

ISLAMABAD: With the United States seeking a gradual increase in the water tariff to recover the full cost of its delivery both for irrigation and urban uses as part of its proposed financing for the $12 billion Diamer-Bhasha dam, the World Bank has come under severe criticism from international development lenders for not funding this 'highest priority project'.

Sources noted on October 24 that the forthcoming strategic dialogue between the United States and Pakistan ahead of a fresh round of discussions of the water sector task force (WSTF) of the so-called Friends of Democratic Pakistan (FoDP) would focus on Islamabad's precise plans for water sector reforms and the World Bank's lack of interest in the Diamer-Bhasha dam project. The two events are expected early next month.

Pakistan: US funding dams in Pakistan: official

Right Vision News, October 7, 2011

WASHINGTON: The United States has provided support to complete the final phases of two hydroelectric dams in Pakistan: Satpara in Gilgit-Baltistan and Gomal Zam in South Waziristan, the State Department stated. "We are considering doing more in the sector," stated the department's spokesperson Victoria Nuland, as media reports suggested that the US would also support the giant $12 billion Diamer-Bhasha dam project. Ms Nuland noted that Pakistan had requested international community's support for development of the Diamer-Bhasha project.

"We recognise that such a hydroelectric project would help meet many of Pakistan's long-term energy and water needs, as well as advance social and economic development," she stated. "We are considering how we can best support Pakistan's request, as are other bilateral donors and multilateral financial institutions." The US, she stated, had not yet made a final decision on this giant project but noted that providing support to such projects was part of a broader signature energy programme in Pakistan that the US announced in 2009. "We continue to work with the government of Pakistan to determine how best to use US civilian assistance," Ms Nuland stated.

Subsequently, the international community provided over $5.4 billion aid for the rehabilitation process.

Although only two weeks after the disaster, the Earthquake Reconstruction and Rehabilitation Authority was established to supervise the process, the New Balakot City has yet to be established to accommodate the homeless people. A sufficient number of quake-affected people are still homeless. There are 1,200 schools in the calamity-hit areas where no proper shelter is available for children.

More Mangla Dam like raisings needed

Pakistan Observer

After many years, a vital water storage project, the raising of Mangla Dam, was inaugurated by the Prime Minister, which would add to power generation and provide additional irrigation water. Pakistan at this point of time needs similar other initiatives without losing time and only then the crushing issue of power and water shortage can be addressed. Water and power shortages have been chronic issues and despite availability of hundreds of sites for construction of mega, media and small size dams. This sector is the most neglected one. Over the last sixty four years, we have been able to build only Tarbela and Mangla dams which contributed a lot in bringing more areas under cultivation and added significant quantity of electricity in the national grid. In the last four decades, no such project had been initiated while silting was reducing the storage capacity of the two dams. In this scenario, the raising of the Mangla dam was a welcome development as it would enhance the power generation capacity by 664MW and raise the water storage capacity by 2.09 million acre feet of water.
